Put a spring in your suspension system

IN SELECTING A VEHICLE equipped with air suspension, you have chosen a car with excellent handling characteristics and a system that automatically adjusts to vehicle load. This sought-after technology can be found in luxury SUVs, high-end executive saloons, and load-lugging estates. It will come as no surprise, then, that such a hi-tech system requires you to follow the manufacturer's original component specifications. At the design stage, all the intricate details of the system are considered in order to assure an optimal driving experience. However, as with all components, air suspension components have a service life and may need to be replaced while you still own the vehicle.

Words & Photography by Scene Media

It is important that you choose the right air springs when they need replacing, since they play such an important role in supporting the weight of your vehicle. Unlike a coil spring, air springs can be inflated and deflated, depending on conditions. As such, the quality of the air springs determines the effectiveness and reliability of the suspension system. As you maintain your vehicle it makes sense to try and preserve as many of the original characteristics as possible. This starts with using the best replacement components. For cars with separate air spring and shock absorbers there is no better choice for replacement units than BILSTEIN B3 air springs.

MOST CARS in the UK are funded through finance, and supercars are no exception. With a deposit at the start and a sensible balloon payment at the end of the term, monthly repayments can be kept as low as possible, freeing up your cash for other purchases or investments. JBR Capital is the UK's only independent lender, dedicated solely to high-end vehicle finance, having loaned more than £330m to date, with loans from £25k to £5m. As well as hire purchase and lease purchase agreements, JBR Capital has seen increasing demand for equity release, whereby an owner of an existing supercar or classic car unlocks the cash tied up in the vehicle, while still being able to keep and use the car. Whichever way you decide to finance your new supercar, we recommend speaking to experts who understand its true value. The friendly team at JBR Capital have a wealth of supercar and classic car knowledge, and they can help to create a tailored finance quote to suit your needs and circumstances.
